Getting to 100%

100% USE RECYCLED MATERIALS

100% FAIR TRADE CERTIFIED™ SEWN

100% PERFORMANCE EVERY WATERPROOF SHELL WE MAKE

The excuses: It's too hard, it's too expensive, nobody makes the fabric, it doesn't perform. The reality: This is no longer true.

As a company, we strive to uphold an uncompromising dedication to quality. We make products that perform, in the conditions they were made for—from belay parkas like the Grade VII, to stormproof shells, to our Nano-Air insulation for moving fast in cold conditions. And we design our products to last, because the longer you can keep something, the less likely you are to replace it.

An excerpt from our 1991 catalog highlights both points: "A person is not likely to fashion a spear for themselves whose point will break off in midflight: nor is someone who weaves their own basket likely to make it out of rotted straw. Similarly, if one is sewing a parka for a mate who is about to go hunting for the family with a temperature at 60 below, all stitches will be perfect."

Quality and performance have always been a given, but we also aim to make all of our technical products with recycled material. Doing this requires converting our virgin synthetic materials to recycled ones without compromising on performance.

But first we had to prove to a wider audience what our rigorous lab and field testing showed—that the recycled fabrics we were using performed just as well as their virgin counterparts. We tested the hell out of hundreds of fabrics, and with the help of new suppliers, we've successfully converted over 300 products from our technical line to recycled materials—most of those in the last two years.

And this season that includes the entire waterproof shell line (over 60 styles across our Alpine, Snow and Sportswear collections). That's a big deal—not necessarily from a technical innovation standpoint, but in terms of capacity. In order to meet our 2020 goal, there has to be a ready supply of recycled fabrics. Luckily, relationships with our supply chain were strong and longstanding—we shared values, they trusted our direction and they were willing to figure out how to make it happen.

Each shell is a multistage, multinational endeavor. It begins its life as recycled plastic chips that are collected in Italy and Slovenia. Yarn spun from these chips is then woven and finished in Japan, and the final garment is cut and sewn in Vietnam. The ability to collaborate with our worldwide partners and with every material type required for every waterproof shell has given us increased confidence that we can bring people together to get shit done.

The conversion was slow and gradual for a long time, then sudden. Now we've reached a point where we can draw a line in the sand that every shell uses recycled fabrics—and is Fair Trade Certified™ sewn—or we simply don't make it.

Stories You Wear

A look back at six years of Worn Wear, and why we still think it's worth repairing your clothes for free.

Worn Wear was born in 2013 from the realization that, no matter how responsibly we build our products, nothing can beat keeping gear in play as long as possible. Clothing is not usually the first thing that comes to mind when we think about waste, but in 2015, landfills received 10.5 million tons of textiles. Not to mention the energy footprint required to create new stuff to replace the old.

Repair is radical because it directly opposes the linear economy's dependence on disposable products and planned obsolescence. Worn Wear promotes a circular economy: keep an object in use for as long as you can, get the most value out of it, then recover and repurpose the material at the "end" of its life.

We believe in this so strongly that our team has been continuously cruising around the country in a fleet of mobile repair shops with the mission of fixing your stuff—or teaching you how to fix it—for free. We see it as a small investment in a habitable planet.

According to our customers' Worn Wear® blog posts, there are other reasons for holding on to well-used clothing, and they have nothing to do with landfill statistics. Folks say that clothes tend to jog their memories about good times they've had while wearing them. There's the twinkle-eye joy of passing them on to the next generation. They are, after all, the stories we wear.

Patagonia Provisions®

What could be simpler than eating? We all do it a few times a day. Yet that simple act can change our future. At Provisions, everything we make has a reason for being: to fix a broken food system. We believe that industrial production methods are destroying the earth, so we're leaving this extractive mentality behind and moving on to a regenerative one. When we grow and harvest our foods, we use organic farming practices that restore nutrients to the soil and remove carbon from the air. We fish using techniques that protect endangered species and habitat. We're working to give back at the same time that we take. So when you eat anything we produce, you're saying no to Big Ag, to poisoned landscapes and damaged oceans—to the status quo. You're eating to save our home planet.

Thoughtful gifts. Wide selection.
